Stop Worrying, Fighting and Struggling over Money – for Good!

Expert says it's possible for couples to be peaceful at any income

(June 15, 2009; PHOENIX) — The number of US weddings will likely top 350,000 this month, regardless of the economic pressures that many new couples face. But after the champagne is spilled, many husbands and wives are left seeing “red” by continual conflicts over money or big debts on the family’s balance sheet.

Karen Russo, author of “The Money Keys: Unlocking Peace, Freedom and Real Financial Power”, says that with a common purpose, good communication, and practical daily actions, intimate partnership can coincide with a prosperous bottom line, long after the wedding guests have gone.

“Often as a marriage unfolds, moments of romance can turn to resentment when it comes to couples communicating about money matters,” Russo says. “If both parties don’t have the same financial goals and clear agreements about spending, saving, and sharing, there is a loss of focus that results in two people living together but not growing together financially. This is a core problem that can lead to conflict, wasted resources, and even divorce.”

Russo’s “Couples Love & Money Checklist”, detailed in her book, allows a couple to discover an inspiring vision for their money lives, create common goals and to understand each other’s expectations and roles in the family’s finances.

Russo adds: “In the checklist we cover issues like ‘What past money ‘mistakes’ are we willing to forgive?’, ‘What’s the best system for our money management?’, and ‘What financial future is possible?’ On average, a flower bouquet lasts seven days, but arguments around money can last a lifetime. I’ve found that couples who discuss finances openly and honestly discover that the wealth of their intimacy increases along with their savings accounts.”
